

McCullough, as a cook, was "all man". He could use every pot in the kitchen for preparing a meal, as I recall it, for the great chefs of the world do not stop in the middle of preparing a repast and wash pots and pans. He kept his knives finger-cutting sharp and occasionally wore a white hat, apron, etc., to give the place a more distinguished look. His menu often showed German potato salad (made it himself), knockwurst mit home fried potatoes, various stroganoff dishes, sandwiches similar to the best, varied soups. rich beef stew, and similar items. He loved to cook! And he like to see us eat! His pot and pan washers had plenty to do, too. Naturally there were some who thought his dishes too spicy and others who thought them too bland, pleasing everyone is hard. But ol' Jack put out a lot of stuff and if you couldn't get it then you were just too picky. How the kitchen fared financially I never knew, but I could hardly wait for lunch, on days when I had a dollar.

Our Snack Bar was also a student run operation although in its initial movement it had been a work of the Taylor Press. The heat in the building in the early days left a lot to be desired and the Editor bought a large coffee pot and saw to it that each morning it had the coffee and the water and was "plugged in". Styrofoam cups stood nearby with that phoney creamer and some sugar and students helped themselves under the honor system for a dime a cup. It became obvious that such service was hardly the job of a dignified faculty member and so the work went to Dave Lipke, a student who was also able to repair Volkswagens and lift considerable weights. For the next two years he would see to it that the coffee was ready and that some pastry stuff showed up from time to time. He kept the pot scrupulously clean, swept the floor, stored the supplies, and made a coffee that all agreed was among the best available. Using a trick of the Editor's (Lipke really knew it on his own) no coffee was ever wasted and the funding of the project went well. Yes, we had a few thirsting but no money types and probably the maximum income
