

had not fully recovered from an exhaustion affair, Dr. Cohen did not feel up to great physical stresses, and Dr. MacRae was in his seventies. But there was pressure from Dr. Grauley and some slight suggestions from others that led to the agreement to a set of volleyball games to be played in our gym, Westminster then having no recreational facility of that proportion and the season being winter, well, cold outside at the best. It was felt that neither Dr. MacRae nor Dr. Van Til should be compelled to participate and the teams could be formed as the various faculty members felt inclined to join the fray.

Biblical came up with a team of Mr. George Clar, Dr. Grauley (the tall man), Dr. Vannoy, Dr. Newman, and the Editor. Needing six men it was hoped Westminster would allow us to use a graduate student, the ubiquitous Elio Cuccaro. When the Westminster team arrived it was discovered that they also only had five men and hoped they could use a grad student whom they had brought for the occasion. It was a happy concession for both parties..their grad student had been a volleyball all star in college and they felt good about that but our Cuccaro was in a class by himself in a lot of things and we felt good about that. Sides of the net were taken, it was tested for height and tightness and the battle was on.

The Editor does not recall all those who played for Westminster but among there were Dr. Jay Adams and Dr. Davis. All in all they were taller but the men of Biblical had a touch of determination that was pure heart. The games began with hope but for a short moment, not much promise.

That was because the Westminster team scored the first 8 points on their first service. It was crazy the way the ball came into our area and how inept we suddenly became. Mistakes were made of the most elemental sort and I think it was because we felt that playing intellectual persons was beyond our skill. But then things changes. The Biblical players fell into a pattern of performance. Using Dr. Grauley at the center net we began "setting them up" and he continued
