

healthy things slipped in. We use a tomato sauce which, in abundant years, we make ourselves but otherwise buy from some cheap source and season it up to our standards. On this tomato sauce we place a considerable quantity of sausage, sweet and seasoned, and pepperoni. To this we add mushrooms and onions, olive black and green, chunks of green pepper and who knows what and the cover the whole mess with a combination of provolone, mozzarella and muenster cheese. (Sometimes we omit some items for the benefit of the delicate tummies of some of our personnel) The cheese completely covers the pizza and we cook it until the cheese has melted and saturated the whole. WE have served it with a salad or whatever and hot peppers on the side. My wife figures one pizza will serve three people and that is sometimes right and just once in awhile, when monstrous eaters are present, it has been a bit scant. The cost is very reasonable when you don't have to make money at it..if we were operating a restaurant we might have to figure on a different basis.

At one time we featured a "Dunzweiler" pizza, just the crust rubbed with olive oil giving it a "bald" appearance. We had a "Pakala" pizza in which everything was served upside down giving a confused appearance. And we had a "Peterson" pizza in which the main ingredient was center material from old baseballs and a "Vannoy" pizza that was perfectly smooth on top giving it an unruffled appearance. The "Murray" pizza had no tomato sauce and so it went.

Because the work is done from the Seminary's cafeteria with limited oven space, it was sometimes slow. But worth waiting for. The crust is thin, the topping is enormous..we do place forks at the table although if one is brave, one may pick it up. The forks also allow those who eat with unwashed hands to be less Pharisaical in the total role.

The dinner programs have consisted of testimonies from the students who are graduating and, once in awhile, from the faculty members..who emotional status at the time guarantees this will be a long session. We all weep a little bit and drown our sorrows in the special beverage the Editor prepares...a calming potion.
