V. Conclusion

As noted earlier, the writer feels that he has missed something in not having known or met the subject. The study of his work has been enlarging and engaging. There are aspects of his ideas that are not close to mine, and vice-versa. But the overall thrust of a very health-giving ministry cannot be overlooked and there are a lot of things we may learn from it:

We do not need to be hesitant to speak for the truth...

A real concern for the flock will lead to the giving of ourselves...

The trials of life come to all of us, we need not fear them...

Criticism is a sharpening device that actually improves the quality of our performance...

Reaching to both help and be helped is a necessary and voluntary part of any successful ministry...
