

3. Conclusion

This is, to some extent, a matter of buying the truth and not selling it...having the gift and appreciating it...knowing the teachings and being blessed in the value of them. There are many other ways in which the truth might be presented but a firm grip on the teachings of Christ is a solid step towards the fulfillment of spiritual life...in any environment and especially in the academic world.

III. Conclusion to the Series

In proper perspective we must remember that salvation and all the resultant blessings are of grace. We are not trying to suggest ways in which we earn or merit special favor from God in this series of discussions. Our suggestion is the application of some spiritual principles that will stir our souls while the academic fires are stirring our heads. At the same time we shrink from the idea of some automatic formula that immediately ends the problems of wandering or backsliding...matters of the heart are not so easily dealt with. But we think if this chapter can be studied continuously in the light of the testimony it offers, it gives good advice in the matter of maintaining spiritual life. And even in the school-world...the maintenance is a vital concern for the individual believer. It is truly good to have life...and to let the life that we have, have us.
